Edward II (ruled 1307-1327) was the first English king to be deposed, and it has often been accepted that he was murdered soon after by having a scalding hot poker forced up his anus. Warner shows that there is no contemporary evidence for this, showing that all the accounts that say it happened were written many years after

Edward II, who ruled from 1307 until 1327, when he was forced to abdicate, was undeniably a failure as a king and as a war leader. Kathryn Warner's biography accepts Edward's many failings, but seeks to provide a fuller portrait than the usual portrayal of the wayward and ineffectual ruler.

The name le Galeys means 'the Welshman', and Edward II was of course born in Wales. As with the Fieschi letter, there is nothing in Edward III's wardrobe book which names le Galeys as an impostor or says that his claim to be the king's father was false, and the keeper of Edward III's wardrobe, William Norwell,
