Rothenstein became one of the most experimental printmakers in Britain during the '50s and '60s. As well as found objects such as wood offcuts and metal debris, he incorporated fresh 20th century imagery into his relief prints, combining photographic material with traditional woodcuts and linocuts. Numerous major galleries currently hold his work and he was made Hon. RE and elected RA in 1983.

During the 1890s Rothenstein direct contact with wood was sought again, alongside drawings of the simplest kind. The chosen wood was up to 1985 parana pine which has a straight close-grained surface without all the interruptions of knots and irregularities found in elm wood. When printed it gives a smooth distinct solid black.
